Text:

Charity

Charity is the act of giving assist to those in need of it. It is a humanitarian act. It involves giving money, goods or time and effort to the needy.

Charity is done without expecting something in return. Giving money or food to poor people is an example of charity. Poor, sick or injured people are generally considered the proper people to whom charity should be given. When such people are not supported, they often begin begging, which is directly asking for help from people they don't know. Others may rely on support from charitable organisations. These organisations provide basic needs such as food, water, clothing, health care and shelter. The most common form of charity is donating money. The money is then used to buy these basic needs. However, there are many other actions that may be performed as charity, such as teaching orphans, donating blood or money to help fund medical research.

To end, charity is really good and necessary action for the welfare of the people and the community.
